Report of Funded and Unfunded Projects

Funding Information:

Past

2002	Obsessionality, Distraction Strategy, and the Accessibility of Suppressed Thoughts Harvard College Research Program Grant Principal Investigator This project investigated the effects of repeated thought suppression practice in healthy individuals and explored moderators of suppression ability, including obsessionality and distraction strategy.
2008	Pluralistic Ignorance in the Perception of Others' Emotional Lives Stanford University Graduate Research Opportunities Grant Principal Investigator This project investigated people's perceptions of the prevalence of others' positive and negative emotions, and causes and consequences of systematic misperceptions in this domain.
2015-2017	Social Misperceptions and Friendship Formation Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (Canada) Insight Development Grant 430-2015-00412 Project Consultant (PI: Frances Chen, Ph.D.) This project investigated social integration and friendship formation, what motivates people to seek social contact, how people develop a sense of community and belonging, and how different people cope with social setbacks. Because the quality of a person's social relationships and social networks predicts many long-term mental and physical health outcomes, enhanced knowledge about these topics is expected to contribute to the public good and welfare.

Narrative Report

I am a clinical psychologist providing behavioral case formulation and psychotherapy for individuals with a wide range of complex psychiatric conditions at The Pavilion at McLean Hospital and in my private practice. Following my education at Harvard College, Stanford University, and Suffolk University, I completed my clinical internship at the National Center for PTSD and my postdoctoral training in the VA Boston Healthcare System. Prior to my appointment at McLean Hospital, I served as a clinical research psychologist at VA Boston, as the PTSD Expert Evaluator for the VA–DoD Consortium to Alleviate PTSD, and on the faculty of the Boston University School of Medicine.

I have supervised clinical interns and postdoctoral fellows and have taught undergraduate, master's, and doctoral students. I currently provide supervision to psychology trainees at Harvard Medical School. In addition, for over a decade as an adjunct professor at the Tuck School of Business and the Master of Health Care Delivery Science program at Dartmouth College, I taught ethics and leadership to MBA students and executives. I have provided leadership development coaching to C-level executives in Fortune 100 companies and have been retained as an expert psychological consultant in major civil litigation.

My clinical approach is scientifically informed, and I have contributed substantially to basic and applied psychological research. I have over 40 publications, and my research has been funded by the National Science Foundation, cited over 5000 times, and featured in media outlets such as the New York Times.
